Teacher Training

Before Using Guide Connect

Warren is the headteacher of a secondary school.

He knows how he would like training to be given, and has tried to gather his senior team to discuss in the school.

The SLT are receptive, but it has taken 4 meetings to agree on the next steps and who will deliver what training.

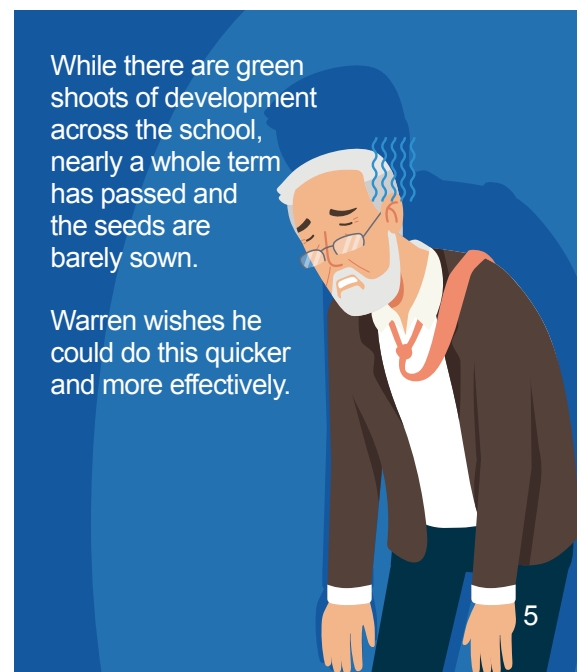

By the time an inset rolls around, the training is given all in one day, with limited supporting materials. Tracking is left to individual team members in different departments who already have a ton of other responsibilities.

Warren knows what the school needs, but doesn't have a way of speedily spreading and influencing culture change in his school.

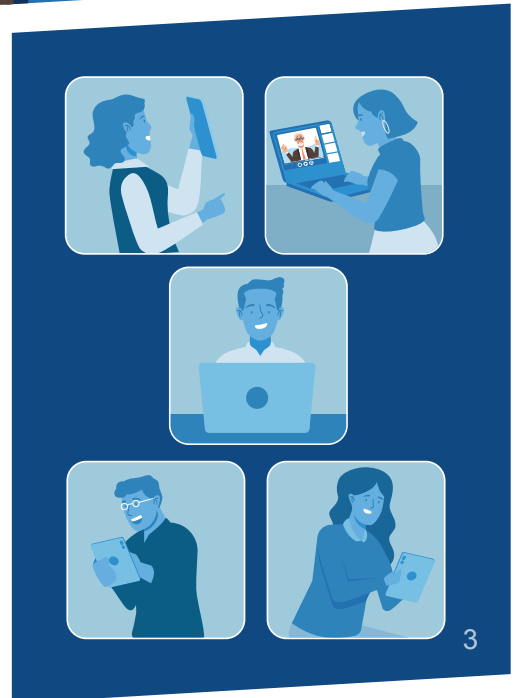

While there are green shoots of development across the school, nearly a whole term has passed and the seeds are barely sown.

Warren wishes he could do this quicker and more effectively.

Warren notes down the training he would like to give in school.

He creates 4 short videos explaining what he would like his SLT to develop into training videos and where they will be stored.

INPUTS

On making the video, the SLT members, think much more about the outcomes they are expecting, rather than the content they are producing, they follow an outcomes based approach.

The videos are uploaded to individual staff portals, where staff engage collectively and have impact points set in the videos to ensure they're evidencing the progress and application of the knowledge.
